A patent has been granted to Joel H. Brown and John Brown of Jerome Junction for a truck.

W. A. Clark of Jerome has been granted a patent for the Red Jacket mine, Verde mining district.

Mrs. A. J. Knoblock has returned to Prescott from an extended visit with relatives at South Bend Ind.

The Duncan mine at Pot Holes near Yuma, after an idleness of several months, has been started up again.

Mrs. Harry Johnson has left Jerome for Butte, Mont., to join her husband, who left Jerome three months ago.

The Verde company at Jerome is having three handsome cottages erected to replace some of the burned ones.

Building in Jerome is still being retarded by the non-arrival of lumber. Dozens of buildings are waiting on material.

Probate Judge Frank of Yuma has received the new of the death of his oldest brother, Emil Frank, in Portland, Oregon.

J. B. Valdrini has located a promising mine in the Black Hills district near Jerome called the City of New York.

The city council of Yuma is making arrangements to have the north end of Main street graded and macadamized to the river front.

The postoffice department has awarded the contract for carrying the mail from Castle Creek hot springs to Columbia to A. A. Call of Algona, Iowa.

The First Congregational church of Jerome has been incorporated by the following named citizens: John Wade, F. S. Harford, Elwin Tarr, Mrs. Deane Merrill and N. S. Hitchcock.

The Southern Pacific company has erected two mammoth pile-drivers for work on the new steel bridge at Yuma. They are the largest in use and have 3,000-pound hammers with a fall of eighty feet.

Miss Maggie Craven, sister of Mrs. John Maloney, has arrived in Nogales from Washington, D. C., and is visiting with Mrs. Maloney. Miss Craven is not unknown in Nogales, having visited there before.

Mr. German Blay of Hermosillo passed through Nogales the other day on his way home from a four months' trip through the United States and Mexico. He came directly from the City of Mexico.

Mr. Harry Mitchell, formerly cashier in the railway office at Nogales, who went home to New York some months ago, has recently accepted a position in the Santa Fe office at Albuquerque and is now there.

Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Dillon left Jerome the other day for this week for London, England, where the former will attend to some business for the Jerome Copper company. They will be absent about six weeks.

Ringmaster Wilson, assisted by Clowns Frank Cox and T. E. Farish, will be in Yuma on November 4 with the democratic circus. Wallace's great circus will be here the next day. Wait for the big show.—Yuma Sentinel.

Telephonic communication between the various Copper Queen offices at Bisbee will be established shortly as also between the homes of several officials of the company and the departments in town, and at the plant and hoists.

O. B. Hardy has returned to Nogales from San Francisco. He stopped at Fairbank on his way back and visited his property in the Whetstone mountains where recent developments have uncovered a very rich and extensive body of peacock copper ore.

R. J. Hartman passed through Nogales the other day on his way back to Sonora. It was reported that Mr. Hartman had negotiated the sale to the Southern Pacific of La Barranca coal field in Sonora, and was on his way there to attend to the transfer.

C. O. Keefe of Jerome has let the contract for the erection of a three-story building on the site of his old store. This shows the enterprising spirit that Mr. O'Keefe is made of, says the Reporter. He is putting up a structure of which Jerome need not be ashamed.

Water was turned on Thursday at the big hydraulic plant of the Temple Bar Consolidated Mining company, at Temple Bar on the Colorado river. The washing of gravel by direct pressure as done at Temple Bar is a great achievement in hydraulic mining, and has heretofore been considered by many an impossibility.—Yuma Sentinel.

United States Parker John Kuhns, who went from Nogales to Porto Rico with Miles' army, has returned home. When he arrived at New York from Porto Rico he only weighed 140 pounds, but he went to his old home where he was made well and fat. He thinks he is now eligible to enter the fair man's race, says the Vidette.

The largest baby of the season was born to Mr. and Mrs. John Fabbra on Tuesday evening. Fabbra excitedly told several parties that it weighed "twenty pounds and three inches"—three ounces. Of course the happy father was overestimating its weight a few ounces, but it certainly weighed as much as sixteen pounds when born.—Jerome Reporter.

"The republican platform in Arizona says not a word about silver," is the democratic plaint. Neither does the democratic platform in New York, which state will elect more than thirty congressmen and a United States senator. If the democracy wants to do something for silver why don't they say so in New York, where voters count and could have weight.—Nogales Oasis.

Thomas Harris, employed on one of the cranes in the smelter at Jerome, met with quite a serious accident the other day. In pouring some hot metal from one of the converters it struck in a green ladle, and as a result an explosion followed and the most of the metal went up and set fire to the crane, burning Mr. Harris severely. To save himself he had to jump from the crane to the ground, a distance of twenty-five feet, dislocating both ankles and otherwise bruising himself.

Kilpatrick & Goddard, the Los Angeles contractors, inform us that the prospects are bright for the construction of a row of concrete business houses from the lot where the Jerome hotel stood to the corner next to the Grand View lot, says the Jerome Reporter. This will include the Jerome hotel, Brisley & Tarr's old stand, Merrill Bros., Surmer's old stand, Jerome meat market and the site of the New York store. This will make a first class business block and one that Jerome should be proud of.

Colonel W. P. Harlow is in receipt of a letter from his partner, Mr. John A. Gowan, announcing that himself, Mrs. Gowan and Master Arthur arrived at Honolulu on the 9th instant. They made the trip by sailing vessel and were eleven days on the voyage, which benefited Mr. Gowan's health greatly. He wrote that the next steamer following the one conveying the letter will sail on the 9th proximo, and they expected to return to San Francisco by that vessel, in which event Mr. Gowan will in all probability reach Nogales before December 1.—Oasis.

A movement is on foot among the business men of Yuma to induce the Southern Pacific company to plank the new steel bridge now in course of construction across the Colorado river, and make a toll bridge of it. The inconvenience of ferrying horses and wagons across the river hinders traffic between Arizona and California at this point to a great extent. It is believed a toll bridge can be secured if the proper representation can be made to the company, and the people of Yuma should lose no time in furnishing an abundance of evidence to show that it would not only be a paying investment but would be a great accommodation to people on both sides of the river.—Sentinel.

Mike Nugent and Jack Lacey of the S. P. hotel ought to be arrested for malicious murder or criminal carelessness. For a week or more the guests of the hotel have been complaining of a peculiar odor that occasionally drifted in from the banks of the Colorado. Mike and Jack knew where the trouble came from, as a skunk had been seen prowling around the back yard several times at night, but neither had nerve enough to tackle the little animal. Means of extermination, however, were devised in the shape of a trap, made of an almost air-tight box with a sliding door. The trap was baited and placed in the pathway of the little intruder. The next morning the boys thought they had their odoriferous enemy secure, as the trap was sprung and there was something in it. Of course it could be nothing but a skunk, so the box was properly weighted and dumped into the river. That morning Old Tom, a valuable mouser, failed to show up at the usual time and fears of foul play were entertained by his many friends around the hotel. The next night, however, his skunkship was on deck as usual, but was relieved of the burdens of life by a shotgun in the hands of Joe Barroville, a waiter at the hotel. Old Tom has not been seen or heard of since.—Yuma Sentinel.

A Little Comedy of Errors

BY S. S. MORTON.

"That's so," assented Warner, with a mournful inflection, as if he were reluctantly admitting a proposition which he had found to be all too true. "The political field pays better; for, what if they do pitch into you, the opposition press, I mean, you draw your ducks regularly so long as you're in office, and the less you do to deserve it, the better your chances are of being appreciated by the public. Office-holding is a soft business, if a man isn't a fanatic on duty and knows how to look out for number one; and I guess we can trust you for that, North."

"Oh, yes, that has always been a very important figure with me, and I daresay it will continue to be. And why should it not, pray? A man is the natural guardian of his own interests, and if he neglects them they are apt to suffer; no one else will look out for them. But, on the other hand, there's an almost irresistible impulse to help the man that has himself."

"Provided he doesn't help himself at the dear public's expense," suggested Warner dryly; a bon mot at which both he and North laughed indulgently, and the latter added:

"But even then, my dear Warner, you should recollect that there are usually rogues enough in authority to connive at his escape, unless they happen to be so deeply concerned in his transactions that their only way to save themselves is to sacrifice him and make him the huge scapegoat of the race."

"Now you're hit it!" declared Warner, turning sharply to North. "Wild horses couldn't drag the admission from Clipper, but I've always believed—and said it, too, all in the family—that this was about the size of that outcry against Damon. Why he should have been hounded out of office by a set of rogues, who had probably been deceiving the taxpayers ever since they went into politics, I don't see. It's on the principle, I suppose, of punishing the starving wretch that steals a loaf of bread and letting the shrewd scoundrel that swindles whole communities go scot-free. Of course, there's no reasonable doubt that Damon was crooked, but who imagines that he was any worse than Brown or Jones, for instance? He was unfortunate enough to get found out; they were shrewd enough not to. That's the way I figure it out."

Warner spoke with considerable warmth, and as if he were certain of North's sympathy.

It was with blank dismay that North perceived to what definite suspicions against persons quite unknown to him he was supposed to have committed himself by his innocently abstract remark. He hastened to take refuge behind a convenient breastwork of caution.

"Now see here, Warner," he said with an air of speaking in the most sacred confidence. "It will never do to say this, you know, and really, I did not wish you to understand me quite as you did. I don't consider it expedient to make any definite charges against anyone, whatever my private opinion may be."

"Oh, of course; no use to bring it up now; but if we get Halleck in there he'll sift the whole business. That's what I told Clipper all along, as an argument for opposing Halleck's nomination; but he said: 'We've got to give them the treasurer, or it will cost us the other offices, like enough.' And so it would, I suppose. If we had made a split on Halleck it would have done the business for you, for they were determined to get one of their men in, either for treasurer or attorney, and Clipper said: 'So long as we elect the city attorney, I'll risk Halleck's investigations.'"

North, quite bewildered by Warner's relations and equally uncertain to what sentiments he ought to commit himself, contrived here to give the conversation a turn from local to national politics; on which safe ground they continued until the end of their walk. Then, as they paused at the hotel steps, Warner suddenly reverted to personal affairs.

"Well, then," he said, "there's an understanding, is there, North, that you are to leave all the details of the canvass, for the remaining two weeks, to Clipper and me, just the same as if you were not here?"

"Absolutely in your hands," returned North, with emphasis. "You see I couldn't do better. I don't see how I could," he added abstractedly.

"No, nor I. It will have a better look, you know, if you appear to be indifferent. Wymer, now, is just crazy over the election. He talks about it day and night, waking and sleeping, drunk and sober; it's literally his one idea. First one he ever had, so of course he wants to make the most of it. I think you've shown good sense, North, in keeping yourself so thoroughly out of a few moments. Of course I'll not undertake to do anything there, and I'll not venture to stay very long, either, for fear some of North's innumerable clients should appear upon the scene and involve me in embarrassing complications; still, for the sake of appearances and my own peace of mind—that office and partner will be a haunting terror until I have boldly faced them—I think I would better go, and at once."

This point settled, his next quandary was, how should he find Market square without—dependent not to be thought of—actually inquiring the way?

Still pausing on the street corner, he looked speculatively higher and thither. Suddenly his grave and puzzled countenance lighted up with relief.

"Ah, there is Warner; perhaps I can contrive to have him extricate me from this dilemma," thought he; and the next instant: "Hello, North!" "How are you, Warner?" were the salutations that were exchanged as the two gentlemen cordially clasped hands.

"Where are you bound for, North?" was Warner's first inquiry.

"To the office," returned North, unblushingly.

"You are? Going crab-fashion, eh?" And Warner laughed gleefully at this palpable hit, for North, without knowing it at all, had been sauntering in the opposite direction from Market square, with every step putting a greater distance between himself and that aristocratic portion of "down-town."

"Oh, I wasn't going there directly, you know," he responded negligently, without deigning even to smile at Warner's suggestion. "However, if you are going that way yourself, I will walk with you as far as the office. Anything new this morning?" he added in a confidential tone as they started on together, Warner unconsciously taking the lead.

"Nothing much, I guess. Heard about the row on High street? No? Why, it's all over town! You see, Rochester and Bingham got disputing with old Wymer last night, and they came to blows before they could be separated. They were all a little 'under the influence,' you know; just enough to make them quarrelsome. It was a regular knock-down affair which some hundred or more voting citizens, chiefly of the lower classes (besides your humble servant, who represented the aristocracy, you know), happened to witness. The workmen must have been highly edified by seeing their friends and champions making Kilkenny cats of themselves."

North shrugged his fastidious shoulders, and with the tips of his gloved fingers, daintily stroked his sweeping mustache.

"By Jove, Warner!" he finally ejaculated, "it's enough to disgust one forever with politics!"

"Oh, I don't know," returned Warner, in cheerful dissent. "I confess I should rather have it happen just as it did than to have any of our men concerned in it, when it can be arranged that way just as well as not; but how about Clipper's knock-down encounter with Duncastle last spring?"

ENGLAND'S NEW EXPORT.

A correspondent writes to tell us of a painful and alarming sight he witnessed at London bridge yesterday. A Barcelona ship, which had brought to this country a cargo of Spanish goods, was loading ballast for its return journey. The sight made indeed a significant object lesson. We wish the British workman would meditate on it. Ballast is not exactly a profitable export for him, however capitalists drawing their incomes from abroad may shrug their shoulders in indifference.—London Mail.
